The director of an environmental think-tank has pointed to a new study as evidence that social policy has a role to play in the fight against global warming. Richard Wilcott, head of the Institute for Environment Research (IER), said the study found that the rate of global warming dropped in conjunction with historical events that slowed economic activity. Mr Wilcott said the study proved it was necessary to strictly control activities known to be linked to global warming. There is clear agreement in the scientific community that the effects of global warming will be increasingly harmful, so the government needs to respond promptly.

A. Immediate actions against global warming are needed ✓

B. The role of historical events in economic activity

C. The place of public policy to stop global warming

Advertising has always played a critical role in companies' success. Interesting ads can attract new consumers, while badly designed ads may evoke negative reactions. The biggest problem that companies face is that it's very hard to determine whether an ad will be successful or not. While big corporations in particular may employ thousands of experts, they still find themselves wasting millions on ads that do not have the intended effect. Recent technological developments have focused on fixing this problem. Software that tracks eye movement and machines that can track viewers' emotional responses are increasingly being used to test new adverts. Will this transform the advertising world? Only time will tell.

Choose the best heading for the text.

A. Using technology in advertising is not cost-effective

B. The role of advertising throughout history

C. Improving the efficacy of advertising

Law targeting commerce tricks

A new law is being considered in the United Kingdom to target 'scalpers' – people who buy products and services online only to then sell them on to others for profit. Currently, it is illegal to purchase football game tickets and sell them for a higher price, but everything else is fair game for scalpers – including concert tickets, theatre tickets and even things like video game consoles or shoes. In fact, there are people who do this professionally: buying multiple things they know are low in stock, so they can sell them afterwards for double the price, or even more. These professional scalpers do this with the help of computer programs that can automatically buy products on their behalf as soon as they become available and before any regular customer can get their hands on them.

The biggest problem this proposed legislation faces is that it's impossible to ban the sale of second-hand goods. Indeed, being able to sell items you don't need – be they old or brand-new – is a fundamental right in the current capitalist system, and also pivotal to achieving sustainability goals. To bypass this issue, the government has suggested it will be focusing on the technologies used by scalpers instead. In effect, the goal is to stop scalpers from using programs to do their buying for them, creating a fairer system for all customers.

What about scalpers themselves? Many must be acutely aware that what they do is, although not currently illegal, certainly morally dubious. But as long as the law allows them to, the money's probably just too good to give up.

Answer three questions about the text.

1. Why is 'scalping' such a big problem?

A. Because scalping creates supply issues for companies

B. Because scalpers are using an unfair advantage to profit ✓

C. Because scalping is forcing businesses to raise their prices

2. Which of the following problems is the new law facing?

A. It can only be applied to services, not goods

B. It doesn't target the methods that scalpers use

C. It conflicts with environmental objectives ✓

3. What is the author's opinion?

A. Scalping is the result of living in a capitalist world

B. Scalping is an unethical but lucrative business ✓

C. There is no law that can effectively eliminate scalping

1Email from client

Dear Wánḁé

I have just returned from observing the three-day sales training course in Islamabad, Pakistan, and I would like to provide some feedback regarding the event.

Firstly, please extend my congratulations to your course management team for the choice of venue. The auditorium was not only roomy and airy but also equipped with state-of-the-art facilities, which is exactly what I had in mind when we booked this course. My delegates travelling from other cities were particularly pleased that their hotel rooms were in the same building as the conference rooms. Their feedback on the amenities was extremely positive as well, though I did receive a couple critical comments regarding the catering selection. Not your fault, though!

The trainer was fantastic. I knew it was a smart choice not to go with the first sales trainer you recommended – I'm sure he's excellent at his job, but I don't think he would've been able to build rapport with my team as quickly as Elspeth did. I especially appreciated the team-building activities. Those can frequently be quite stale, but Elspeth's friendly behaviour and humour made them a delight.

Overall, I think the first course was a smashing success, and I look forward to the next course in a month's time. I do hope we don't encounter any delays with shipping the materials for the cost this time. I know there were some issues with the post office, but perhaps you could dispatch everything a week earlier for the next workshop?

I look forward to your response.

Kind regards
Jenna Noble, Sales Director

Importance of sleep

Sleep is one of the most universal experiences in the history of the world. Everybody sleeps; everybody needs sleep. Some need sleep more than others: babies, for example, but also certain animals. Why is sleep so important, though? How does a bad night of sleep affect our brains and the way we do things?

Numerous researchers have tried to find answers to these questions, and some of the results they have produced have been illuminating. We now know, for example, that sleep helps us to learn things better. When we sleep, our brains process knowledge they've acquired through the day, helping us to retain it – a process known as 'consolidation'. What's more, despite past assumptions, consolidation takes place throughout the course of a person's life, not just when we're young. In fact, while many people believe sleep becomes less important as we age, this couldn't be further from the truth. Sleeping well keeps our brains 'sharp' – meaning that we're less likely to experience mental health problems and cognitive decline if we have a good 'sleep hygiene', i.e. we rest consistently at night throughout our lifetimes.

So, how can we force ourselves to sleep better? According to experts, there are some simple steps everyone can take to improve their sleep habits. Adjusting the light in the bedroom, making sure that the temperature is comfortable and that no outside noises can be heard are all easy changes that can be implemented. Other recommendations include avoiding eating or exercising late at night. If none of this works, then meditation may be helpful.
